Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: ...which the Saracens held beyond the Pyrenees, that of Septimania, or Gothia, was won from them by the Franks (755). Christendom had suffered much during the victorious career of Islam; it had lost its birthplace, Palestine, and its earliest churches in Asia Minor and Africa; but it had saved its existence, and soon after the death of Charles Martel (741), it found a representative of its unity and power in his grandson Charlemagne, who, as Emperor of Western Christendom, extorted some acknowledgment even from the Caliph himself. THE EMPIRE OF CHARLEMAGNE AND ITS DIVISIONS. The Merovingians rapidly degenerated, and the reigns of government gradually dropped from their palsied hands. Entrusting gradually all functions of government to their siverintendents of the royal household (majores doinus, mayors of the palace), they became mere puppets in their hands. The raco of the Pepiuidio acquired an hereditary claim to the office of Major-Domus in Austrasia. Pepin of Heristal, Major-Domus in Austrasia, became, by the victory of Testry (687), also MajorDomus in Noustria, and called himself henceforth Dux et Princeps Francorum. Although at first no change of dynasty followed this victory of tho nobles over tho popular party it set the rule of the Merovingians practically aside for that of the leader of the Eastern Pranks, Pepin of Heristal. The son of tho conqueror of Testry was that Charles Martel who saved Christendom in the battle of Tours (732). Pepin, the son of Charles Martel, saw in Iiome the one source of religious authority which could give a sacred sanction to his rule, Rome saw in tho Franks the one state which could savo her from the ambition of tho Lombards and the pressure of the Eastern emperor, and consequently the union of the two powers was soon d...
