

The Incas and The Prince of Palenque

Mr. Baird has a real talent for spotting the blindingly obvious that most people miss. - Philip Gardiner; author of The Serpent Grail.

I have been following Robert Bruce Baird's work with great interest. It is obvious that he has accumulated much knowledge regarding the older secret societies. - Jim Marrs; author of the NYT best seller Crossfire.

Book Description: It has been well over a decade since I invested my fortune and life on research of the pre-Columbian people of America. We are taught to believe a history that tells us the Inca leaders of an Empire larger than Rome told their people to lay down their arms to a grossly inferior force of invaders because of prophecies such as condors pursued by falcons, the Cosmic Serpent and a moon surrounded by a triple halo, etc.

We know that it is extremely unlikely that Columbus could have been the son of humble wool-carders. He acquired too much (unexplained) education to have sprung from such origins in the Middle Ages. From the moment of his arrival in Portugal it is evident that he wielded power, prestige and even wealth. This suggests to a number of modern experts that he could only have been the scion of a royal or noble family, a family just as obscure as Columbus himself. His rank allowed him to marry into Portuguese aristocracy when he took Felipa Perestrello as his wife, and, when she died, he courted several noble and wealthy women of Spain.

He was the favored friend of Spanish dukes and the Portuguese king and queen, not to mention Isabella herself. He hobnobbed with the richest men in Spain who actually financed his voyage. In class-conscious medieval Europe, these cannot have been the accomplishments of a wool-carder's son who supposedly was only a merchant skipper from Genoa. The sails of his ships held a clue. Vasco da Gama did too. It was the Templar cross. He was not a 'nut' as the Britannica implicates. He was a `made man as they say in certain circles. ~ Robert Bruce Baird. About the author: History is largely propaganda. Many scholars know that and it still goes on today; but the reasons for this social engineering and priestly manipulation or economic intrigues are known by few, if any. My books attempt to deconstruct the myths that are at the root of most of the problems we face in this life on Earth. All sciences come to bear in my work, and I am indebted to many who have made contributions to my effort and research. It is encouraging to hear them say they have benefited by learning the facts behind most of the worlds myths. But all the facts are not known despite what some people want to believe. Hopefully, people will study and address the real issues we face. Fighting the good fight often means having to do some things we might rather not do. It is hard work but I love it.~ Robert Bruce Baird
